INFO

The psychoanalytic range of thought and the forms of treatment that are derived from it are under pressure since everything needs to happen quickly and efficiently these days. It's a challenge to find ways in which valuable psychoanalytic knowledge can be used in a practical clinical context for short-term interventions, without losing sight of a person in all its complexity. It's a major challenge to quickly discover the unconscious dynamics, the fears and the desires that are hidden by a person's resistance, and to translate this to the patient in a clear way.

There are several theoretic models for intensive short-term psychodynamic psychotherapy: the more interpersonal approaches, such as the DIT model (Lemma, Target & Fonagy), and the more intrapsychic approaches. Following Davanloo's methods, Allan Abbass represents the intrapsychic approach. During this seminar, he will give us a clear explanation of his metapsychological framework, that is based on the attachment theory. Using this framework, we can comprehend psychic suffering in all its forms, from 'light' to 'heavy'. He will also briefly comment on the scientific research that is being conducted on his model and its efficiency.

After this, with the use of video material, Allan Abbass will give a presentation regarding the diagnostics and treatment of patients with personality disorders. He will demonstrate a number of specific therapeutic techniques to work with defense mechanisms. He chooses an active and a quite directive process-oriented approach to do this.

For this seminar, no thorough previous knowledge is required of psychoanalytic thinking. This way, the seminar can also be an inspiration to psychotherapists of other orientations, or to primary care psychologists who are interested in an in-depth way of working short-term. Simultaneously, this in-depth teaching, during which specific techniques will be illustrated with video materials, can also be a source of inspiration for experienced psychoanalytic psychotherapists for their therapeutic practice.

The seminar will be taught in English.
